The acquisition of the growth and functional properties of post-natal cardiomyocytes is dependent upon the stimulation by specific factors and extracellular signals. The most rapid induction of growth and functional responses is observed after exposure of cardiomyocytes to serum. In this study we have sought to characterize the immediate early gene response of adult rat cardiomyocytes to serum stimulation. The immediate early gene response to serum was studied at the transcriptional and post-transcriptional levels. Changes in c-fos mRNA levels were examined following various serum exposure times and conditions, including long term stimulation of cardiomyocytes with serum. Correlation was found between c-fos induction and cell growth, suggesting that c-fos induction may be a critical event in the modulation of adult cardiomyocyte growth and functional properties. In addition, we examined the role of the immediate early response gene in mediating the effects of growth factors by using antisense techniques to prevent c-fos induction. c-fos antisense oligonucleotides interfered with the induction of immediate early gene expression and also prevented the induction of growth, but not contractile, functional responses to serum stimulation of adult rat cardiomyocytes. These data suggest that the immediate early gene response may be a critical mediator of the effects of growth factors in the adult rat cardiomyocyte.Tag: cool summer night After the sun comes out it's time to have some more "sunny evenings".
