Evaluation of a capillary electrophoresis screening test for the diagnosis of congenital adrenal hyperplasia due to 21-hydroxylase deficiency in children with ambiguous genitalia. A screening test for the diagnosis of congenital adrenal hyperplasia due to 21-hydroxylase deficiency in children with genital ambiguity was evaluated. The test is based on the measurement of the ratio between the concentrations of 21-hydroxylase and aldosterone synthase activity, and includes cortisol and 17-ketosteroids (17-KS) measurement by radioimmunoassay and capillary electrophoresis. The case report of a patient with ambiguous genitalia is presented. The genetic analysis of the CYP21 gene showed two distinct deletions. The capillary electrophoresis test results were positive for 21-hydroxylase deficiency. In conclusion, this capillary electrophoresis assay was reliable for the diagnosis of congenital adrenal hyperplasia in children with ambiguous genitalia. Necessity is the mother of invention. No one would argue that this is the case when it comes to the product of "raw, natural ingredients." We're talking of course, about the food that is found in a packaged or frozen meal. About the Author: Jose Bek is an Internet entrepreneur and marketing expert who can be found offering his insights on anything from why the real estate markets are in a boom right now to what's really behind the so-called "fiscal cliff." The food industry, as a whole, may not be the most inventive, but, on the flip side, it does provide consumers with an excellent and affordable alternative to those meals made with "artificial" ingredients. With the continued popularity of frozen and packaged foods, it is no wonder that there is a surge of organic and natural foods. As consumers are becoming more and more aware of the potential health risks associated with non-organic foods, they are looking for foods that are as pure and wholesome as they can get. Many people will just buy organic food because they
